Thanks!Multicolor fluorescence in situ hybridization analysis reveals chromosomal aberrations in paraffin-embedded breast carcinomas. Fluorescence in situ hybridization (FISH) analysis can be used for the detection of chromosomal aberrations in routine pathology specimens and improves the diagnostic accuracy of histopathological analysis. In this study, we have optimized a FISH protocol with a pancentromeric probe that allows the simultaneous evaluation of the chromosomes 7, 8, 9, 11, 12, 17 and 18 in the same specimen of different cell populations. Furthermore, we used a three-color FISH assay comprising the aforementioned probe, a chromosome-specific centromeric probe for each chromosome of interest and an additional pancentromeric probe for distinguishing between different chromosomal changes. In addition, we have used multicolor FISH to characterize the chromosome patterns in 60 cancer-associated aberrant mitoses, and the results showed a high correlation to the data obtained with cytogenetic analyses. Application of this novel, sensitive assay for an optimized FISH protocol demonstrates a wide range of chromosomal aberrations in different tumor cell populations.
